AVSAR works in close cooperation with organizations such as Indicorps, the International Federation of Medical Students Associations (IFMSA), the American Medical Student Association (AMSA), and the American Association of Physicians of Indian Origin (AAPI) in an effort to create reform in India.

AVSAR (uhv-sir) a not-for-profit program strives to create partnerships, which utilize the worldwide resources of a "Global India" to promote positive change and reform in "Domestic India." AVSAR was started in July of 2003 by a 27-year old Indian-American physician seeking to increase the momentum of healthcare reform in the slums of Mumbai (Bombay). Clinics were reformed, a new "model" clinic was created to serve more than 1,500 child-laborers, and an effort to recruit 1 Non-Resident Indian (NRI) student-doctor per month transformed into a mission to bring more than 60 healthcare professionals to India by the end of 2004. With a growing international audience, and its first group of passionate physician-volunteers and Public Health graduates already selected, AVSAR hopes to continue building upon its successes and reach its stated goal of drawing more than 500 volunteers to India on a yearly basis by July, 2008. The recruitment process is competitive, but encourages individuals to work in a field which THEY feel passionate about; and thus promotes an increase in the momentum of all fields needing of reform, such as education, law, healthcare, environment, engineering, business, etc.
